Non-Com heading our US Marine personnel, for the excellent way in which they handled matters last night.

The PM sent for me to meet him at Admiralty House at noon. We had a long talk, at the conclusion of which he asked me to ascertain from the US Government what classified information he would be free to use tomorrow when he must respond to questions in the House of Commons.

Some hours later we received a reply, which I communicated to Philip de Zulueta.

Our people were generally agreeable to the draft passage proposed by the Prime Minister. The changes suggested were woven into the text received from him, and came out as follows:

I lunched with Douglas Fairbanks at Bucks, a hurried meal. He was to go to see Page Smith immediately after lunch, to discuss the Cuban episode.

This afternoon, I opened the Embassy orientation course, by exhorting them to be good boys and girls, worthy of their privileges.

Findley Burns brought in Commander H. J. Evans, of Metropolitan Police District No. 1, a fine looking chap, whom I thanked warmly for the splendid work of his men last night in protecting the Embassy.

Frank Pace came to see me. He is here for two purposes (1) as a member of the President's Foreign Intelligence Board, and (2) as a Director of TIME-LIFE. In the latter capacity, he expects within a [redacted] period of eighteen months, to visit almost every country in the world, and make recommendations as to how TIME-LIFE reporting might be improved.

Ran into Graham Martin in the corridor, and haled him to my borrowed office for a long talk.

Dean Rusk asked me whether I had heard any adverse comment on his absence from Nassau. I told him frankly that it [redacted] aroused speculation over whether he had, in some degree, lost the President's confidence. He said such was not the case; he had considered the matter carefully, and thought he and the President should not be absent from Washington at the same time. Moreover, the diplomatic dinners, in which over a hundred missions were involved, had been scheduled long ago; the foreign Ambassadors might well have resented his chucking them in preferen for a bilateral conference.

Tonight, about eleven o'clock, Kay, Phil, and Stevie Graham came to see us. We drank in the New Year, with uproarious glee. There is no couple like the Graham they are imaginative, warm, and altogether delicious.
